

Review reprinted from Pittsburgh Magazine April 2009
By Gordon Spencer, Contributing Editor

Brian Price
Tired of Singing in My Car
Self-produced

Brian Price, who's from Weirton, W.Va, has been steering people into music and words for nearly 20 years, as a radio DJ, producer and programmer in several cities. No surprise, then, that he'd find his way into creating something of his own. This singer, songwriter and guitarist travels along 13 tracks of his own material on this debut CD, Tired of Singing in My Car, alongside supporting vocalists, guitarists, and keyboardists from around the region. His tunes and his voice come across as elemental. But close listening reveals distinctive harmonies along the way. More important, get a good look at his liner-note lyrics. You'll see original, unpredictable writing worth reading for imaginative ideas and images. Musically his material most resembles rock and country, although Price indicates that he's tired of easy labels and prefers not to define his musical style. He's had training on keyboards and guitars and figured, he says, he'd had enough grounding to do more than just sing along with car-radio broadcasts. Hence a try at following a direction of his own. Follow his lyrics. They point in the right direction.